

USC Viterbi
School of Engineering
Department of Aerospace and Mechanical Engineering

Department of Aerospace and Mechanical Engineering, University of Southern California

A significant drift velocity develops between n-dodecane and surrounding nitrogen within the shock front, causing local fuel-lean/fuel-rich separation. Mach 10 shock compression and rapid thermal non-equilibrium drive progressive n-dodecane dissociation into light hydrocarbons dominated by ethylene.

USC
Center for Advanced
Research Computing